

Married At First Sight Chapter 3740

Married At First Sight Chapter 3740 – When Trenton’s parents went to jail, he was only eighteen. Carrie only knew how to spend money, and relatives were circling the Newman family’s assets. He and Carrie couldn’t hold on to the family fortune.

After Camryn regained her sight, she still couldn’t use her eyes for long periods, so Dalton continued managing most of the company’s affairs.

Luckily, Callum was now involved. If anything went wrong, Callum wouldn’t let the Newman family lose anything, especially since much of it belonged to Camryn. He would ensure that her assets remained secure.

“You’ve been in school too long, and now you’ve been brainwashed. Dalton is amazing, right? Our father trusted him with everything, and now he’s serving this blind woman!” Carrie’s voice dripped with bitterness.

Carrie hated Camryn, but she hated Dalton even more. She blamed him for the company falling into Camryn’s hands. With Trenton in school, it was natural for Camryn to take over the business, but it meant Carrie lost control. She believed she should have been the head of the family, with all the money she could ever need. Instead, she was left humiliated, used, and forced to abort a child she couldn’t keep.

Thinking about the pain of the miscarriage, Carrie’s face went pale. She hadn’t expected it to be so agonizing and terrifying with all the blood loss. She believed Dalton’s betrayal of her parents, helping Camryn, had brought her to this miserable point in life.

Camryn eyed Carrie coldly. “Carrie, have you blown through all your money again?” she asked sharply. “If you need money, just ask directly. Stop wasting time. Your parents knew what belonged to who. I’ve said before, I’ll reclaim what’s mine, and the rest goes to Trenton. And don’t forget, you’ve already taken some of what belongs to my parents!”

“Because I’m your mother’s biological daughter and your father’s adopted daughter, I have a right to inherit too. You may not have done well in school, but you should know about inheritance laws,” Carrie snapped back, though her confidence was faltering.

“Carrie, have you spent all your money again?” Camryn repeated coldly. “If you need it, just say so instead of rambling on. Your parents knew what belongs to whom. I’ll take what’s mine, and Trenton will get the rest. And don’t act like you haven’t already taken a chunk of my parents’ property!”

I’m done discussing this. Every time you come, you say the same thing, and I’m tired of hearing it. If you’re so unhappy, if you think the company should be yours, then do something about it! Fight me for it! What’s the point of yelling here?

You're a fool who can't even hold a job, nothing more than a pretty face. Even if you took over the company, you'd run it into the ground in no time. Don't think our parents left you a fortune—they left debts too."

Carrie opened her mouth, then finally said, "You're lying. My mother told me the Newman family has a billion in assets."

"That's the company's worth," Camryn replied. "But the real estate and illegal profits have been confiscated, and there are huge fines to pay. Do you think it's that easy to run the Newman family business?"

Do you think your parents left you a pile of gold? If it weren't for Trenton, I would've cut you off long ago. I won't let you take advantage of me."

Carrie had no response.

"Second sister, you don't really understand what's going on. Our parents sheltered you too much. You know nothing except how to spend money," Trenton said, feeling helpless about Carrie's attitude.

Sometimes, he even blamed their parents for spoiling her so much.