

Chapter 1994 Pregnancy Examination Report

The dream from the previous night felt incredibly vivid to Alexandra, yet frustratingly, he couldn't recall a single detail.

After freshening up, he headed to the living room, finding Sonia already bustling about with breakfast preparations.

Her demeanor shifted slightly upon seeing Alexandra emerge, appearing somewhat uneasy and evasive.

Alexandra shot Sonia an unhappy look and urged impatiently, "If you have something on your mind, just say it outright."

Sonia shook her head, busying herself with setting up the table. "Nothing. I'll be heading to my training. You go ahead and enjoy your meal."

With a slight limp, she exited the dining area.

At that moment, Alexandra realized that her walking seemed a bit peculiar.

Was it due to her frequent training sessions lately?

Recognizing Sonia's abilities, Alexandra resolved to train her as a bodyguard, ensuring that she could protect him.

Hence, it seemed reasonable for her to undergo more rigorous training.

With this plan in mind, Alexandra proceeded to enjoy his breakfast with a sense of peace.

Meanwhile, back at the training grounds, Sonia remained preoccupied throughout the day, her thoughts consumed by the events of the previous night.

She felt a mix of shyness, panic, and sadness, causing her emotions to become tangled and overwhelming.

Noticing her distracted state, the teacher sighed in resignation. "If you're feeling unwell, perhaps it's best to call it a day."

With those words, he left, leaving Sonia to her thoughts.

Resting her head on the table, Sonia came to the realization that she had developed feelings for Alexandra.

However, she was aware that the woman occupying his thoughts was likely the name he had uttered in his drunken state the previous night.

Her status was low, making her vastly different from Alexandra in every aspect.

She realized that the fleeting moments of pleasure from the previous night belonged to Alexandra's fantasy as well as her own.

She accepted that this would forever remain a secret, deeply buried within her heart.

Watching Janet's fatigued state, Brandon hesitated before suggesting, "If you're feeling sleepy, it might be best to call it a night. The draft won't be finished in just one day."

Janet shook her head, her voice tinged with longing. "It's been a while since I've used scented candles. Could you fetch one for me? It helps me sleep more soundly."

Concerned for Janet to have a good sleep, Brandon moved to retrieve the candle but was interrupted by a call from Frank.

Over the phone, Frank conveyed, "I've reviewed Janet's pregnancy examination report. There are several indicators below standard. Is she currently on any medication?"

Recalling Janet's stressful circumstances, Frank speculated if she might be resorting to sleeping pills or similar remedies.

Brandon assured him, "No, I've been keeping an eye on her. She doesn't even use scented candles, let alone sleeping pills."

Hearing that, Frank said, "Bring a candle here. I'll test it myself."

Observing Brandon's uneasy expression after ending the call, Janet asked with concern, "Who were you talking to?"

With a complex expression, Brandon crouched in front of Janet and cautioned, "I'll tell you, but try not to get too worried."

Observing Brandon's seriousness, Janet set down her brush and inquired once more, "What's wrong?"

Brandon exhaled deeply and replied cautiously, "Frank called me. He mentioned there were some discrepancies in your pregnancy examination report. He suspects it might be related to the candles, so he requested that I bring one to him for testing."

"What?" Janet exclaimed, rising to her feet.

She pondered the situation carefully and realized that she had been feeling unwell lately. But hadn't the candles already been tested and deemed safe?
