

Chapter 770 A Puzzling Observation

The examiner glanced in the direction Bryan indicated to look at Liam.

The examiner then scowled and swiftly moved towards Liam, delivering a powerful and lightning-fast blow.

Liam swiftly reacted, attempting to shield himself with his elbows. However, he was still forced to move back a few steps due to the sheer impact.

His heart raced intensely as he absorbed the impact of the blow. He could only sense numbness spreading, and he clenched his teeth determinedly to remain on his feet, resisting the urge to collapse to the ground.

Bryan took pleasure in Liam's distress and mocked, "Loser, leave now. No crutches allowed for the test. You might not even be able to take a step later. Don't embarrass yourself here."

With a serious expression, Liam turned his attention back to the examiner, paying no heed to Bryan.

Despite the astonishing force behind the blow, Liam sensed that the examiner hadn't exerted his full strength. It seemed more like a test than a malicious act.

Given Liam's current physical condition, he wouldn't have been able to withstand a more powerful strike.

Nevertheless, the impact was undeniable.

The next moment, the examiner said, "Well, he doesn't have any forbidden items in his possession. It's just a regular walking stick. Bringing it doesn't violate any rules and is allowed on the testing field."

Bryan's expression changed, and he objected, "What? How can he bring something in?"

The examiner shot Bryan a cold look and approached him deliberately. "If you have any objections, you can also experience one of my blows. If you can withstand it without falling, you can also bring a crutch in. What do you say?"

Bryan's face paled. He was well aware of the examiner's strength and dared not subject himself to a blow.

Furthermore, even if Bryan were to endure the examiner's strike, he would not only incur the examiner's displeasure but also put himself at risk of injury while expending energy for no tangible benefit. Moreover, what was the use of bringing a crutch into the testing filed for him?

Reluctantly, Bryan backed down.

"Anyone else with an issue?" The examiner gave the crowd a cold, sweeping gaze.

Apart from Bryan's deliberate provocation, no one else objected to a handicapped individual carrying a walking stick. Hearing the examiner's inquiry, everyone shook their heads.

Observing the absence of further objections, the examiner cleared his throat and continued, "Since there are no objections, I will proceed. Very few individuals manage to reach the summit of the gravity mountain concealed behind the blue curtain. However, reaching the top isn't the sole criterion for passing this test. Success is determined by your individual performance."

This revelation surprised everyone. They were initially under the impression that the first trial involved scaling the gravity mountain, but now they realized that this wasn't the only way to pass.

For the participants, the prospect of not having to conquer the mountain was undoubtedly good news. They had heard stories from previous candidates about the terrifying nature of the gravity mountain on Genesis Island.

In previous years, those who failed the test saw the mountain as an insurmountable barrier.

The examiner said coldly, "This test isn't just about your physical strength and endurance but also your perseverance and resilience. I'll be evaluating your overall performance. Is that clear to all of you?"

"Yes, sir," the participants responded in unison.

The examiner nodded in satisfaction and said, "Excellent. Now, everyone, step into the blue curtain. I hereby commence the examination."

With that, everyone hurried into the blue curtain.

The corners of the examiner's mouth curled slightly as he watched Liam's retreating figure. The examiner muttered to himself, "I didn't anticipate an outsider having such a potent primogem force and experiencing Power Imbalance Syndrome. This is intriguing."
