

Chapter 848 Financial Crisis

Seeing this, Newell seized the opportunity to say, "Yes, Liam, we'll be a family someday. It'd be great to have stronger bonds."

Yesenia noticed Newell's friendly attitude, which sharply contrasted with Liam's. She couldn't resist responding sarcastically, "Look at him. So refined and educated, unlike someone else here who lacks respect!"

Done with Yesenia's constant criticism, Liam retorted stoically, "Do you not feel ashamed accusing others of being uneducated?"

Their argument persisted, leaving Julie feeling helpless.

To prevent the argument from escalating, Julie shifted the conversation, saying, "Alright, what's the use of arguing? Weren't we just discussing cooperation?"

Her words brought a brief silence, but as they sat down, each began crafting their own secret schemes in their hearts.

After the discussion, Julie realized that Baxter, their potential collaborator, held a lower position in the Williams Group, merely a deputy manager in the media department with limited decision-making authority for collaboration.

As for Newell, having retired from the Group, showed little interest in its affairs.

He and his son occupied a fringe of power within the Williams Group and were not particularly invested in its business.

However, the opportunity had emerged to reestablish a partnership with the Red Murray Group, potentially allowing them a more significant position within the Williams Group.

After some thought, Newell suggested, "There's a general shareholders' meeting of the Williams Group this noon. If you're interested, why don't you join me?"

Listening to their conversation, Liam, who had remained silent, grasped the situation. He couldn't help but roll his eyes at Yesenia.

He realized Yesenia was still fixated on their previous lavish lifestyle and, failing to manipulate Julie, sought out another chance herself.

Just then, Julie's phone buzzed. It was her secretary, sounding extremely anxious.

"Hello, Miss Fiber! There's a situation! The company is experiencing a financial crisis! The account doesn't have enough funds to last until next month!"

Frowning, Julie inquired, "How could this happen? Don't we have bank loans?"

The Secretary sighed in despair. "We're juggling two projects simultaneously. The spending is massive, and the bank loans won't cover. Miss Fiber, what do we do now? Without new funds, we might have to suspend the project."

Julie felt uneasy about the situation. Despite acquiring two crucial projects, Pearl's scale was too small, and the available capital was limited. In hindsight, it seemed like she had made a hasty decision.

With the capital supply falling short and the project impossible to suspend, their only option was to seek another bank loan.

The issue lay in the fact that Pearl had already taken on a substantial loan for this project, making it challenging for the bank to approve another one.

Yesenia, still filled with resentment, took the chance to sarcastically remark, "Well, well, a massive crisis strikes the company. Someone only knows how to spend our money without offering any help!"

Julie rolled her eyes at Yesenia and coldly responded, "Mom, please stop saying that. It's just a minor issue.

I can handle it."

After contemplating for a while, Julie addressed Liam, saying, "Liam, I need to handle this today. Please remember to take Asher to kindergarten."

Liam nodded, stood up, and pulled Julie aside, whispering, "I can assist you in resolving the financial issue."

Earlier that morning, the card sent by the National Defense Department had arrived, awaiting Liam to collect it.

To Liam, money held no significance.

However, Julie assumed Liam intended to borrow money through his connections, so she promptly declined, saying, "No need. Considering Pearl's current development prospects, obtaining another loan isn't impossible."

Following her statement, Julie seemed to recollect something and added, "Liam, the project is about to start. I'm short on hands at the moment. If you're available, you could assist me on this matter."

Unable to sway Julie's decision, Liam reluctantly agreed. Checking the time and realizing it was late, he quickly tidied up, took Asher, and departed.

Julie was preparing to leave to handle the issue when Yesenia promptly asked Baxter to accompany her. It was clear that she still intended to set them up.

Baxter was willing to assist, and Julie couldn't decline, so she reluctantly allowed him to accompany her.

Noticing the opportunity, Baxter flashed a smug smile, confident that Liam, whom he considered an unemployed outsider, would be outmatched by him soon.

And he believed that Julie would eventually become his woman by then!
