

Chapter 1799 The Past Between Vinson And Wr...

Janet was caught off guard by Vinson's unexpected question. She found herself at a loss for words, unsure how to respond.

Brandon nodded affirmatively and said, "Wren arrived in Barnes last night. We met at Frank's private hospital. Barring any unexpected developments, I intend to have her examine Janet and begin the treatment process."

Upon hearing this, Janet turned to Brandon with a dissatisfied expression.

When had she made the decision to allow Wren to treat her?

Noticing her dissatisfaction, Brandon reached out and held her hand comfortingly, his expression remaining neutral as he addressed Vinson. "Wren's achievements in the medical field are unquestionable. She has treated many patients affected by Jeremy's drugs over the years. These are verifiable facts."

Vinson's expression bore a distant expression as he gazed ahead, lost in memories of the past.

Ten years ago at the medical research institute, Vinson's experiments were at a critical stage,

Chapter 1799 The Past Between Vin: 🎁 +120 Points at most nearing completion. It was at this crucial juncture that he found his lab partner and girlfriend, Wren, in a dire state of distress. The entire project had been thrown into jeopardy due to an error she had made during a prior stage.

Rather than scolding Wren, Vinson urged her to take a break and get some rest, opting to shoulder the workload for the both of them.

He had planned to devote more time to his girlfriend once he completed the experiments, but before he could do so, Wren disappeared without a trace.

A few days later, while busy working in his lab, Vinson was unexpectedly taken to a psychiatric hospital for no apparent reason.

There, he insisted that he was of sound mind when quizzed by the medical professionals. He questioned the reason for his detainment and demanded the involvement of the police to ensure that his rights and interests were protected.

Faced with Vinson's protests, the hospital staff showed him a comprehensive set of test reports that indicated that he suffered from a severe mental illness. They then emphasized that he potentially posed a threat to himself and others.

Afterwards, Vinson found himself confined to a solitary room in the hospital. Every day, a nurse would come in to conduct a basic examination on him, administer medication, and provide him with meals. Outside of these interactions, he was left isolated, receiving no visitors and minimal engagement from the staff. His experience more closely resembled imprisonment rather than treatment, as it became evident that the staff had no intention of providing him with treatment, but instead, were only concerned with keeping him detained.

Over the first few days, Vinson attempted every possible means of escape. He tried to force his way out, used the phones of doctors and nurses to contact people outside for help, created disturbances, and even resorted to self-harm in the hopes of being transferred to another facility.

Despite all these attempts, however, the mental hospital proved to be an inescapable cage. Vinson found himself trapped with no way out.

Eventually, Vinson accepted his fate, resigning himself to a quiet existence within the hospital and awaiting contact from the outside world.

Within a few weeks, the director of the research institute, one of Vinson's few friends, personally paid him a visit at the hospital.

Noticing Vinson's significant weight loss, he bluntly asked him if he was truly suffering from mental illness.

Vinson kept his composure and shook his head, explaining that he suspected one of his competitors to be behind his confinement. He believed that this competitor, learning of the imminent success of his research and being powerless to stop his progress, had resorted to falsely imprisoning him.

However, the director shook his head and said, "You're wrong. Since you were detained here, I've been conducting some investigations. I recently discovered that your girlfriend, Wren, conspired with the Barton family to hatch a plot with your student, Jeremy. He took advantage of your trust to manipulate you and, together with the Barton family, orchestrated a scheme to label you as being mentally ill."

Upon hearing this, Vinson slowly sank onto his bed in shock.

"The Barton family and Jeremy colluded to have you sent here, and news of your confinement in a mental facility has spread like wildfire. In just a few weeks, your reputation in the medical field has been completely tarnished, while Jeremy has swiftly risen to prominence. Thanks to the Barton family's extensive financial backing and provision of medical resources, Jeremy's research has flourished and propelled him to success. As a result, he was able to obtain his doctorate as Wren's student despite completing only half of his postgraduate studies."