

Chapter 1938 Good At Managing Her Husband

Johanna glanced at Brandon and said, "Taking care of my daughter is what I'm supposed to do. No one needs to repay me for that."

Before Brandon could respond, Johanna continued, "Brandon, how is your company performing this quarter? How are the stocks? Did you complete the acquisition? With everything on your plate, how much time can you manage to spend with Janet every day? If Janet feels sick after you move back, will you be able to be with her right away? Or will you rely on the butler and household staff to take her to the hospital?"

Brandon was left speechless by the barrage of probing questions. He took a deep breath and answered earnestly, "Mom, don't worry. I'll delegate my company tasks to someone reliable and make sure I spend as much time as possible with Janet."

Despite Brandon's genuine tone, Johanna remained unconvinced.

She frowned slightly and told Brandon, "You need to work hard at your age. In the future, Janet and the child will face many expenses. You wouldn't want your current neglect towards the company to cause financial troubles for Janet and the child later, right?"

She frowned slightly and told Brandon, "You need to work hard at your age. In the future, Janet and the child will face many expenses. You wouldn't want your current neglect towards the company to cause financial troubles for Janet and the child later, right?"

Brandon pictured his family struggling after his company failed, and his face grew somber.

Seeing that Johanna had successfully alarmed Brandon, Janet couldn't suppress a chuckle. She pulled at Johanna's sleeve and said, "Mom, don't scare him. Even if his company does fail, I can support us with my design work. And with such loving, supportive parents like you, I'll always find a way."

Noticing Janet's trust, Johanna's expression softened.

She cleared her throat and explained, "I didn't mean to scare Brandon. I just wanted to remind him that young people need to focus on their careers to secure their families' future. I'll take care of you."

Brandon regained his composure and responded, "Mom, that's not going to happen. Even if my company fails, my current assets are enough to support us for many lifetimes. We won't face financial troubles."

Johanna gave a quick snort and countered, "Even if your assets last for several lifetimes, what about your children? And their children? Young people often don't think ahead. Working hard now isn't just for yourselves but also to build wealth for future generations."

Janet felt overwhelmed and said, "Mom, isn't it true that each generation has its own opportunities, and they can forge their own path? I'm not depending on my parents, so why would I expect my children to depend on me when I'm older?"

Johanna found her daughter's view amusing and replied, "You're still young and might not understand. We can discuss this later."

After winning the argument with both Janet and Brandon, Johanna hummed a cheerful tune as she took Janet's empty bowl out of the room.

Janet and Brandon exchanged resigned glances. Janet let out a sigh and said, "Mom really knows how to make her point. Maybe we could try talking to my dad instead. He tends to be more laid-back."

Brandon shook his head and replied, "I wouldn't get your hopes up. Even if we persuade your dad, it probably won't change much."

Janet looked puzzled and asked, "Why not?"

Brandon smiled and explained, "Haven't you noticed? In the White family, your dad might run the business side of things, but your mom makes the decisions at home. And when it involves you, what she says goes."

Janet sighed and admitted, "You're right. Mom does have a knack for managing my dad."
